Over 300 KS3 Art students created individual poppies as an act of remembrance for members of the armed services who have lost their lives serving their country. Inspired by Paul Cummins’ ‘Blood Swept Lands and Seas of Red’ 2014 installation at the Tower of London, students collectively placed their poppies outside the main reception. Students, staff members and visitors to the Academy were extremely moved by the display. Students discussed Remembrance Day in their Art lessons, developing their understanding of the important role Art can play in bringing people and communities together in times of reflection.
It was fantastic. Other professionals/parents who visited site commented on this also. C RISLEY.

I love the Poppy display, it was amazing. J LAYDEN.

It was a triumph. Thank you to all involved. A MUNRO.

It was a beautiful display. As always Art comes up trumps. C DWAN.
I've said before I think it was absolutely beautiful - restrained, dignified, creative, respectful....just a real little flavour of the power of art and a taste of the Tower of London installation (which completely reduced me to tears when I saw it). M KILGANNON.

I finally got round to seeing them this week and they were absolutely beautiful to look at and looked so professional. L MORGAN.

They look great. B SADLER
